- 1 The Suppliers shall provide the Goods and/or Services in accordance with this Schedule
- 2.

1. Background

The Future Flight Challenge, one of 23 Industrial Strategy Challenges, seeks to develop a novel aviation system capable of safely operating novel models of air transportation incorporating drones, urban/ rural air mobility and sub-regional all electric aircraft. Aircraft will have degrees of autonomy and will support the development and execution of delivery services, inspection services, passenger mobility services.

The Aviation sector has a long history of operating a highly sophisticated safe system which has evolved incrementally over 100 years. Aircraft development are approved against exacting standards of certification and this continues into all avenues of the aviation system – air worthiness of the aircraft, safety and security systems of passengers engaging with airlines and airports, after care of aircraft. Safety touches every element of the aviation system and yet a globally documented approach of the whole system is not known to exist.

The insertion of aircraft such as those listed above present significant technological, regulatory and commercial challenges. Aircraft performance, aircraft communication, business models, air space management, use of different aspects of airspace for different aircraft types, it is an extensive list of challenges to be overcome. The Future Flight Challenge seeks to consider challenges that have been identified through consultation and on an ongoing basis. It is felt though that a greater understanding of the aviation safety case of a future aviation system is essential to the challenge and will ultimately be globally valuable to influence emerging regulation and adoption of novel modes of air transportation.

To help the challenge team and the broader system there is a need to consider a total system safety case. The Future Flight Challenge Team are therefore seeking the services of an organisation or consortium of organisations (business or research based) to look at the total system aviation safety case including such elements as:

- Aircraft certification
- Flight operations
- Airport operations
- Air Traffic Management including controlled and uncontrolled airspace
- Human factors
- Degrees of system redundancy
- Maintenance

This is not intended to be exhaustive and will be developed as the study progresses. Consortia members must though demonstrate a robust understanding of the current aviation safety systems as well as an understanding of how the aviation sector is changing as it seeks to adopt new aircraft types and services.

The Future Flight Challenge is supporting the establishment of new aviation systems to accept new classes of electric (or hydrogen) air vehicles with likely high degrees of autonomy. The vehicles envisaged range from drones to air mobility vehicles to sub-regional, fixed wing aircraft. The vehicles themselves present a disruptive technological step forwards but many aspects of the aviation systems must also change radically.

A few examples are highlighted below:

- These new classes of aircraft will increase the volume of aircraft operations and are likely to be delivered, at least in part, as a result of on-demand services rather than scheduled flights. Aviation systems globally are based on a high level of order and structure, the aviation system will have to adapt to incorporate on demand capabilities.
- It is likely that the Airspace Traffic Management systems will include a much higher level of autonomy than today. This could be provided centrally or via a federated system of conflict avoidance. In either case a full understanding of the safety implications is essential.
- Today airspace is typically split to some degree between different classes of vehicle. The Future Flight vision anticipates a much degree of integration.
- It is plausible that autonomous flight control (pilotless) will be required to deal with the volumes and precision required and that aircraft will be required to interact with each other directly to achieve a detect and avoid capability.
- For the drone segment, early flying beyond visual line of sight will be required.
- Ideally all these aircraft, including drones, will be able to share the same fully controlled airspace as airlines and the uncontrolled airspace today used by General Aviation, etc.
- The vision to use air mobility vehicles in urban environments will bring such aircraft near to the city scape with the attendant collision risks with buildings as well as each other and the complexity of micro-meteorological phenomena such as localised wind-shear.
- Not an airworthiness issue, but there will be a need to provide safe solutions for high voltage charging and/or hydrogen provision airside.

All the above and more are addressable issues but the fact that all may require development concurrently presents a formidable challenge. The cardinal requirement is that the overall system-of-systems must achieve at least the same levels of safety as the highly honed current airline aviation system.

It is suggested that the current system's safety levels have been achieved as much by learning and incremental improvement over many decades as through a top-down design approach. The full basis of the safety case may not be fully understood and hence the impact of changing any of the constituent parts may not be known, let alone the impacts of changing many of them together.

As a final challenge, many of the vehicle manufacturers in this space are newer entrants looking to run at a pace nearer to tech companies than aerospace ones.

There is a critical need to collate the current understanding of the basis of aviation system safety, highlight the potential changes under a Future Flight vision and identify key safety requirements and components of the new system. Without such a study, it is conceivable that all the different elements of the new aviation system could be developed and qualified in isolation without an understanding of whether the whole system itself is tenable.

To date, it is not known of any other work taking place on such a broad basis. It is also not believed that any one organisation has the experience and expertise to conduct this activity alone. Research published such as Uber Elevate or Roland Berger's Aircraft Electrical Propulsion focus on the challenges of technology rather than the whole system.

The Future Flight Challenge was formerly launched in August 2019 and is a programme of three Phases. The first phase, now complete, led to an invite only workshop of some 150 businesses, research bodies and universities to consider the Future Flight Challenge in terms of approach, research themes, cross cutting areas of research and areas of additional study required.

The Future Flight Team is executing additional areas of study in 2 other areas; the potential markets and economics of the challenge and secondly the social economics of the challenge. The 3rd area identified was a greater understanding of the aviation wide safety case.

Phase II will launch in May with contracts anticipated to begin work in the Autumn of 2020. All programmes must consider the safety implications of their endeavours but there is a need to be able to consider these developments against a unified backdrop. It is therefore necessary to execute a research study to consider the current and future aviation safety case against which developments can be considered.

The work will be executed by a consortia of research organisations for and on behalf of the UK Research and Innovation Future Flight Challenge. The Future Flight Challenge Director is accountable for the study with day to day responsibility resting with one of two Innovation Leads in the Future Flight Team.

A maximum budget of £100k has been allocated to this research study. Travel and expenses can be added to the schedule of invoicing providing all necessary expenditure is evidenced.

2. Aims and Objectives of the Project

Given the belief that no such similar study has been conducted, it is not possible to describe the exact approach. Instead we will look to take an incremental approach and re-focus the work specification as insights and results emerge. It is expected that the bidder will describe an approach as part of their proposal which will form part of the consultation to initiate the work.

It is proposed to take a broad-based but pragmatic approach to understanding the issues and design space in the first instance. Should this highlight critical areas for further and deeper study, this will be considered after the initial work is complete.

So far as possible, we wish to use public domain safety information to avoid launching repetitive, detailed and time-consuming study work at this stage.

It is hoped that this activity can be led a consortium of UK research bodies. It is expected that several organisations will be consulted including other universities, the CAA and any appropriate private companies. The Future Flight Challenge Advisory Group will provide input to the study as it evolves.

The work has 4 customer groupings:

- 1) The Future Flight Team and Advisory Group - to inform the strategy, roadmap and portfolio selection for the challenge.
- 2) The funded participants - to optimise work content, to inform design requirements and minimise risks to overall solution viability
- 3) The aviation industry globally – to keep the UK aligned globally and to show UK thought leadership
- 4) The wider public to inform discussions around safety of the new vehicles and use cases.

The degree to which the work is published is yet to be decided but it is anticipated that some form of publication will be produced for wide dissemination.

The objective of this research is therefore to:

- Produce a framework that describes both the current and future safety cases for aviation's systems to inform the Future Flight Challenge as it invests £300m into research and development programmes that are developing future aviation system components.

The research will inform the portfolio of projects that the Challenge is investing in, enable greater collaboration and will provide insight to consortia as their programmes develop.

3. Suggested Methodology

This study will consider the aviation system in its entirety. The definition of the system will be a focus of discussion between the consultants and the future flight team but will need to reflect

- Aircraft certification
- Flight operations
- Airport operations
- Air Traffic Management including controlled and uncontrolled airspace
- Human factors
- Degrees of system redundancy
- Maintenance
- Regulatory bodies involved in influencing adoption and ultimately enforcing new regulations aimed at safe operations

It is anticipated at this stage that integration into a wider transportation system is out of scope.

The work will evolve as the research develops as a result of regular interactions with the Innovation Lead and Challenge Director of the Future Flight Team. Regular check points and review points will be scheduled and executed both face to face and via virtual meeting technologies as required.

The research should consider the air vehicle types of the Future Flight Challenge, namely drones, urban / rural air mobility and carbon neutral sub-regional aircraft.

Outputs and expectations

- Review and understand the basis of the current aviation systems implicit safety case presenting the elements of the system, their interactions and interdependencies.
- Consider and compare the key differences and challenges in the potential Future Flight aviation system.
- Ensure that there are no significant omissions in the work planned to achieve safe new aviation systems.
- Inform the safety requirements for the main elements of the new aviation systems.
- Consider other publications references to safety so that effort is not duplicated as a result of this study.

It is anticipated that the consortia will provide fortnightly progress reports to the Innovation Lead with additional communications provided as when required.

Milestones of the programme must be met and any issues arising that will affect the milestones must be raised with the Innovation Lead ASAP.

4. Deliverables

Work will be carried out at the consortia members' establishments.

It is anticipated work will begin early July 2020. This agreement will be in place up to but not after December 2020.

Deliverables of the research include:

- An initial study will be produced describing the basis of the current aviation system safety case and the implications arising as a result of Future Flight Challenge
- An interim report detailing the findings and implications for a top-level safety requirement for key elements of the future aviation system
- Review of this interim report will determine the scope of the draft report to be produced.
- A draft report will be produced for review and discussion with the Future Flight Advisory Group and the Future Flight Team.
- A final report will be produced.

- An agreed communications programme will be shaped between the Future Flight Team and the consortia.

These are the outcomes of the research study. The consortium will liaise on a day to day basis with the Future Flight Innovation Lead and will engage periodically with the Challenge Director and the Advisory Group when additional input, reviews and approvals are required.

Key Milestones of this research study are detailed below.

- Work starts July 3rd
- Milestone – Initial Study on the current aviation system and the challenges that Future Flight poses to the established system – September 4th
- Milestone – Interim Review on Progress August 4th – an essential review with the Innovation Lead, Challenge Director and Consortium to consider how the research is evolving and to re-steer the programme should this be required.
- Milestone – top level safety requirements for key elements of future flight defined in a short report describing the future aviation system in comparison the current system. This will also indicate how the safety requirements can be developed concurrently by detailing the interdependencies of the requirements. – October 4th
- Milestone – Draft Report detailing the findings of the whole study with clear recommendations of what the Future Flight Challenge can influence through its investments and work with consortia. It should also detail areas where additional research is required to assure the UK of a global leadership position in the development of an internationally acceptable aviation system. – October 16th
- Milestone – Future Flight Advisory Group Consultation provides an opportunity to test the report’s findings with stakeholders from both inside and outside of aviation bring a diverse perspective to the safety considerations to be made – November 16th
- Milestone Final report produced reflecting the consultation with the Future Flight Advisory Group. – December 16th
- Report publication schedule to be agreed for January 2021. Elements of the report may remain confidential to the Future Flight Challenge, but it is anticipated that publication of the study will be executed in an appropriate global setting to position the UK as a thought leader on aviation innovation execution.

The work will be supplemented by fortnightly progress report meetings between the consortia and the Innovation Lead.

Agreement to proceed at each stage will come from the Challenge Director.

Schedule for production is essential to inform consortia for Phase II of the Future Flight competition will are likely to be 3 months into a 24-month research and development activity.

This study will provide essential, holistic and transparent insight to the consortia on safety case considerations. Consortia will be asked to show how they are considering the findings of the report at biannual knowledge exchange events. The Knowledge Exchange events will be executed twice a year and it will be mandatory for Phase II consortia to attend such events to share emerging insights on their research and development programmes as part of the UK's aspiration to accelerate adoption of novel aviation system capabilities.
