TERRACOTTA WARRIORS

China was divided into seven independent kingdoms, each seeking to expand their territory and gain control over neighboring states through military, trade, and political alliances. The kingdoms had large populations to call on and greater wealth and influence, which meant they were less vulnerable to attack.

By the second century BC, the warring states period of central government was over, and a unified empire was established. The warring states had large populations to call on and greater wealth and influence, which meant they were less vulnerable to attack.
