Schedule 2

Specification

1 The Suppliers shall provide the Services in accordance with this Schedule 2.

1. Introduction

The purpose of this procurement is to establish the feasibility of the UK government investing in an operational pilot infrastructure for quantum communications networks.

In 2021, BEIS formed a Quantum Communications Task & Finish group made up of experts across industry, academia & public sector research establishments to:

- articulate the opportunities and risks of quantum communications networks, both now and in the future;
- build a strategic case to intervene to further develop these technologies beyond research or wider business support mechanisms; and
- articulate what activities are required to support the growth of the quantum communications industry and realise the benefits of quantum communications for the UK.

The group's main recommendation was for the UK to build a fully operational pilot network incorporating both ground-based and space-based elements to show quantum communications being applied to real-world problems. This proposed infrastructure would comprise of around six nodes across the UK to sustain R&D and support the development of use cases and applications. It is envisaged that this pilot would be a five-year programme representing first step in support of broader ambitions towards a full UK quantum internet.

Before deciding whether to proceed with this recommendation for a pilot infrastructure, this feasibility study is required to develop an outline proposal for the network infrastructure and its operating model, assess the investment case and establish the opportunities and risks.

The UK government has not made a commitment to build a quantum network infrastructure in the UK. This project will be a key piece of evidence to determine whether there is a strong business case to support this intervention, and will be evaluated upon the project's completion.

2. Aims & Objectives

The aim of this tender is to procure a report which provides high-quality evidence to the UK government on the feasibility of implementing a pilot quantum network which incorporates the following:

- A new, permanent fibre network connecting around 6 nodes across the UK, that is fully operational and can be used for both research and product testing/demonstration to support commercialisation; and
- An in-orbit micro satellite mission with new fixed and mobile ground stations, enabling the satellite to link to the UK fibre network to nodes across the globe, whilst also leveraging existing quantum satellite work. This satellite component is required to overcome the limitations of fibre communications and enable very long-distance communications.

The feasibility study should comprise of the following components:

The network – architecture, operation & costs (70% of task)

- a. Location: where should the nodes be located and how could the network be deployed?
 - Consideration should be given to both maximising opportunities across the UK building on existing strengths.
 - How could this build on existing networks and activities, for example the UKQNetel and the National Dark Fibre Facility
- b. Operation: what are the options for the operating model?
 - What activities would this support. How could this enable both late-stage commercialisation activities, such as user trials, and early-stage research to towards the development of a quantum internet?
 - Who needs to be involved in these options? How would industry and research organisations engage?
 - How would the network be managed and access prioritised?
- c. Costs: what are the detailed costs? i.e.
 - Capital costs
 - Operational costs
 - Spend profile of investment
 - How would this investment scale?
- d. Assurance: how would the network support the development of a framework to meet security and assurance requirements.

Value, opportunities and risks (20% of task)

- e. Opportunities and benefits: who would the pilot bring benefits to and how would this vary across the options for the operating model?
- f. Industry support: how do we ensure industry buy-in to the pilot?
- g. Success criteria: Outline proposed success criteria for the pilot to inform future decisions around network expansion towards the development of a UK quantum internet
- h. Risks: What are the main risks and how could they be mitigated?

The wider context (10% of task)

- i. International: How would this interact with international quantum network initiatives?
- j. Time distribution: what are the synergies with time and frequency distribution networks in the UK
- k. Future networks: how would the evolution of adjacent future network technologies be factored in to this initiative?

3. Background to the Requirement

The government has made it a clear aim to be a science superpower. This ambition is detailed in the Integrated Review, R&D Roadmap, and the Innovation Strategy, which sets out plans to cement the UK's position as a world-leader in science, research and innovation. As part of this ambition, the Government is committed to support transformative technologies to yield the greatest benefits for the UK. The government's interest in quantum networks in particular is based on the following:

- A number of nations are proactively developing large-scale demonstrators to support the development of quantum communications technologies and explore their long-term potential. The government has an interest in understanding how these activities affect the strategic advantage of the UK, and whether there are opportunities to collaborate with international partners to further advance the field for the benefit of society.

- Quantum networks offer significant anticipated economic and societal benefits presenting new opportunities to develop enhanced connectivity and resilient communications for the protection of critical assets.
- Quantum networks will be an enabler for other quantum technology applications for example e.g. quantum computing which are expected to transform high value industries. It is envisaged in the longer term that challenges of scaling quantum computing will be addressed through integration into quantum networks – also known as the quantum internet.
- The UK has an emerging quantum technologies supply chain, such as in single photon sources and detectors to support the development of these ambitions.

The origin of this study is the recommendation made by the Quantum Communications Task & Finish Group to support the development of quantum network technologies through a pilot infrastructure to support use case exploration and development.

The proposed pilot would last around 5 years and would involve building a new, permanent quantum network comprising of a fibre backbone connecting around 6 nodes with a geographical spread across the UK. This would be complemented by in-orbit satellite(s) to enable very long-distance communications, amongst other benefits. The purpose of this network is to demonstrate the commercial value of quantum communications systems, generate a representative set of use-cases to capture end-user requirements, and to inform prospective future decisions for a UK quantum internet.

The full Quantum Communications Task & Finish Group Report, including strategic and technical recommendations will be made available to the selected supplier.

4. Scope

The scope of this procurement is to produce a feasibility study report which meets the requirements listed in '2. Aims & Objectives'. The Period of the Agreement will be in place up to April 2023.

Technical scope. The definition of a quantum network used here encompasses both;

A: Near term quantum communications technologies.

- Quantum communications technologies are being developed today to protect the integrity of encryption and data security into the long-term. Quantum key distribution (QKD) schemes are in-principle resilient to interception and therefore robust against future technological developments for decryption. Component technologies are on the market today and early commercial network trials are underway

B: Longer term activities in support of a quantum internet.

- In the longer term, the notion of quantum communications technologies will expand to also encompass networks between physically separated, entangled qubits, allowing distributed quantum computing in addition to QKD. This is otherwise known as the 'quantum internet' or 'quantum networking'.

5. Requirement

The Supplier will be expected to produce a feasibility study report which covers the components listed in '2. Aims & Objectives'. To meet these requirements, the Supplier must produce a project plan which outlines how they will cover the outputs listed above in the feasibility study.

A steering group will be convened to support and assess progress through the duration of the study. This will be comprised of representatives from the supplier, UKRI and BEIS along with other stakeholders as appropriate. The full group will be convened for a kick-off and mid-project meeting. In addition, a regular schedule to maintain contact through the duration of the project will be agreed with the Supplier.

The Supplier must engage with diverse range of stakeholders from the quantum technologies ecosystem along with relevant cross-government officials and incorporate their feedback during the development of the study to ensure the study can be utilised effectively going forwards.

The Supplier must be able to meet the following expectations:

- can evidence significant understanding or expertise in the operation of communications networks.
- can demonstrate significant knowledge and understanding of quantum network technologies.

The key performance indicators for this project are:

- The Supplier covers the defined outputs for the study listed above.
- The Supplier meets the milestones outlined in the Timetable.
- The Supplier provides clear evidence to support proposed options, assumptions, recommendations, and conclusions.
