Small hive beetle (Aethina tumida (abbr.SHB)) represents a significant threat to native honey bees and pollination in Europe. SHB is invasive outside of its native range in Africa, and has proven to be very damaging to honey bee colonies in Australia and North America (Neumann and Elzen, 2004). SHB is known to be spread through trade and movement in beekeeping equipment, as well as other potentially contaminated material such as soil and compost. The species is now present in Europe, having arrived in Italy in 2014 (Mutinelli et al, 2014), which significantly increases the risk of its arrival in the UK.

The Small hive beetle is strongly associated with honeybees, with adult beetles entering colonies to lay their eggs and feed their larvae (Neumann, Pettis and Schafer, 2016). Honeybee colonies have been observed to provide particularly rich food resources for SHB, with stable temperatures and reduced predation making them highly favourable to the spread and establishment of SHB (Annand, 2011).

In the UK context, we have a requirement to understand the major risks around SHB incursions, and to attempt to assess the likelihood of spread from a given arrival point. Part of this requirement lies around establishing a clearly defined geographic understanding of the networks of beekeepers and apiaries around the country, and how these interact. This will help us develop a greater understanding of how SHB may be disseminated through the country in the event of an incursion.

In addition to the anthropogenic movement of SHB, some natural dispersal is also possible (Spiewok et al, 2008), and the development of a landscape-based understanding of how SHB may survive and disperse in the context of the UK is an important factor to consider when attempting to quantify the potential spread of the species.

Combining the potential movement of SHB within the beekeeping industry, with a background level of landscape dispersal could provide the framework for understanding the movement, spread and establishment of SHB in the UK.

Various control measures have been attempted on SHB infestations, with varying degrees of success. The US, Australia and Italy in particular have developed some of the key tools and strategies for the detection and control of SHB. Not all methods may be appropriate for the UK, and it is important to attempt to quantify how successful different approaches may prove in the UK context. Of all the attempted and available control methods, colony destruction, accompanied by a decontamination of the surrounding soil, appears to be the most successful and reliable method (Neumann, Pettis and Schafer, 2016), although additional factors are likely to play a significant role in containing the spread- for example restricting the movement of colonies and beekeeping products (Mutinelli et al, 2014).

Detection of SHB can prove difficult, particularly early in an invasion, when there may only be small numbers of adult beetles present in a honeybee colony. Gathering information on the efficacy of different traps, and differing inspection regimes will help to quantify the level of detection that is possible within a given set of resource constraints. For example, we may be able to compare beekeeper led visual inspections with a more comprehensive programme of government led inspections (e.g., using DNA screening as in Ward et al (2007)). We may also wish to assess the relative success of in-hive traps, baited traps and visual inspections to find our optimal strategy for achieving early detection of SHB.

The overall aim of this work is to increase our understanding of SHB, and crucially, the speed and level to which it could either be eradicated or establish in the UK. This may also help to develop an understanding of the costs of SHB in terms of the number of colonies affected over time- either by infestation or destruction as a control measure.

1. Establish baseline knowledge on SHB ecology, through interviews, expert elicitation and literature review:

Develop a solid knowledge base on core ecological parameters for SHB- specifically focussing on dispersal, reproductive capabilities, and environmental factors likely to affect establishment.

2. Establish baseline knowledge on the most effective trapping and control methods currently available:

Develop an understanding of key methods, how they might be implemented in the UK, and their expected level of efficacy. Also develop estimates of cost of implementation for different methods (e.g. man-hours required or £ per unit for traps or tests)

3. Utilise existing data on UK beekeepers to develop a connected network schematic of the industry (e.g. movement of products/colonies):

It is envisaged that a core understanding of the structure of the UK beekeeping industry will be required to quantify the spread of SHB. The aim is to use existing data to develop this connected network, with any notable data-gaps interpolated using the existing available data.

4. Develop a model to simulate spread of SHB through the UK, with the ability to apply control:

Using key biological parameters and control measures established in objectives 1-3, develop a model that can be used to simulate spread of SHB from a hypothetical arrival point. The model itself should be a re-usable product that forms the main output from this work.

5. Run key scenarios within the model and present these as the core outputs in a final report:

Use the model developed in objective 4 to simulate a number of scenarios (e.g. most likely, best case, worst case, each with differing control parameters). Present these scenarios (e.g. inc. risk maps and costings) as part of the final report.
