Project description

This work builds on a previous feasibility study in January 2021 that demonstrated that wild scallops can be attracted into static potting gear using internal fixed light sources. This novel method of attracting and subsequently trapping scallops has the potential to benefit inshore fishers who use pots to catch crabs and lobsters, by augmenting their catch with a high value species – scallops.

This project aims to optimise the initial design and operation of both the light source and pot so that optimal retention of scallops is achieved. Sea trials will be conducted with the new traps and lights in different areas of high-density scallops in Lyme Bay, Dartmouth, Arran and Orkney. Upon completing of this work, it is expected that trap design, light source used and harvesting method will have been honed such that a new market-worthy form of inshore potting will have been delivered.

This programme of work is part funded by the UK Seafood Innovation Fund (£199,748), which has an upper limit of £200k. Natural England aim to contribute a further £132,900, which will enable the full programme of work to be completed. This specification sets out the detail of that additional work funded by Natural England.

For full information on the project funded by SIF, including work packages and milestones, is outlined below. Natural England will fund Work packages 1, 2, 3 and part of 5 of Programme 1, ensuring expenditure on these elements are completed by the end of the current financial year. By funding this element of the work programme, Natural England are facilitating the full programme of works to be completed by enabling the already secured SIF funds (which are not end of financial year constrained) to undertake two additional sea trials.

WP1 - DESIGN, ENGINEER & MANUFACTURE BESPOKE SCALLOP POTLIGHT

WP1 will be focussed on the design, engineering, and manufacture of a bespoke scallop potting light. The initial feasibility study used 4 x commercially available lights (Fishtek Marine, PotLight) in each pot. The battery duration for the current Fishtek Marine PotLight is 20 days (500 hours). The nature of crustacean fisheries in the UK mean that gear can be soaked from between 3-14 days (), with longer soak durations being characterised by hauls in winter months (where vessels are unable to get to sea to retrieve their gear). Having multiple lights in each pot that require battery changes as frequent as every 2 trips is operationally not pragmatic nor cost effective. Feedback from fishers engaged in the feasibility study, required the use of a single light, that is low cost (<£7) with a minimum soak duration of 40 days. Due to these design criteria, a bespoke scallop potting light with a single D-cell battery is required to progress any chance of scallop potting becoming operationally and economically viable. To this end, WP1 sets out to design and manufacture a light to meet these design criteria.

To get the light to TRL 9 (actual system proven in operational environment) and to meet the demanding cost criteria from the fishers, a bespoke commercially produced light is required. This will require significant time developing e.g., CAD drawings (1.1) and designing and optimising the circuits for extended battery life (1.2, 1.3). Prior to committing to full production tooling, we will make a prototype tool (1.3) (standard procedure in product development) to test (pressure and functionality – 1.6) the design before a commitment to the more expensive automated production tooling (1.5). The key deliverable from this work package is the production of 500 bespoke programmable scallop potting lights that meet the design brief laid out by the fishers.

Despite the complexity of the work package, we do not foresee any risks. We have deliberately chosen to start this work package first (see Gantt) to mitigate time pressures on the engineers and to allow them to make the inevitable design iterations. Moreover, we have experience of commercialising an underwater light and many of the key risks around functionality (IP rating and reliable auto on/off switches) will be reduced by transferring the learning from previous experiences.

Deliverables:

- WP1-D1: Production tooling completed
- 1.8 Manufacture new lights to supply for all projects (P1M1)
- WP1-D2: 500 bespoke scallop lights manufactured

WP2- TECHNICAL INPUT

WP2 is centred around information gleaned from behavioural footage (both at sea and from laboratory test tanks). We consider it necessary to observe scallop and crustacean behaviour in a tank setting and at-sea setting as we are mindful that any assumptions made from behavioural observations in the tank may not reflect actual responses of scallop and crustacean in the wild. The tank-based trials will be performed in a large saltwater pool (~6x4m) and be used to test the behavioural response of scallops and crustacean to varying light stimuli. We will also observe, through video recordings, the movement of the scallops and crustacea with respect to different trap configurations and the efficacy of their retention in differing designs. This lab-based tank study will be supported by at-sea underwater footage of scallops entering traps. Our diver (SC5) will place a camera array on known dense scallop beds off the Skerries bank, South Devon. The diver will also supply live scallops to the tank-based experiments. Information gleaned from both behavioural studies will feed into Deliverable 2 of Work Package 2 (In-situ and tank trials behavioural report) which in turn will inform the stakeholder workshop (3.1) of Work Package 3.

We do foresee risk manifesting in the behavioural trials. Whilst wild-caught scallops are routinely kept alive for depuration purposes and crustacea held in tanks, any behavioural assumptions made from the tank trials must be treated with caution. We understand the limitations of any behavioural observation but feel this relatively inexpensive experiment is necessary to understand scallop and crustacea behaviour with respect to entry pathways and retention probability by the illuminated traps. With our at-sea underwater filming we are limited by an 8-hour battery life and there is a risk that scallop movement (response behaviour to the stimuli) does not occur immediately when exposed to illuminated traps in the wild. We are mitigating this risk by using divers to place traps on dense beds of scallops to maximise the probability of recording the phototactic response with respect to the trap.

Deliverables:

- WP2-D2: in-situ and tank trials behaviour report (P1M2)

WP3 - DESIGN, ENGINEER & MANUFACTURE TRAP(S)

WP3 is a vital element of the work programme. The design of the pot must be practical for use by inshore fishers (can be deployed and hauled easily using conventional equipment), must work effectively as a pot that harvests scallops and crabs (input from WP2) and is practical to make at-scale. To this end, we will use the information gleaned from the behavioural work and hold a workshop with the fishers, gear technologists (L4) and pot makers (SC6) to agree on the best pot designs to carry forward to the experimentation stage. Once an agreed design is in place (and one that can be manufactured by a pot maker at-scale), then the principal engineer (L5) will work the design into a blueprint using CAD for the pot manufacturer (SC6) to start constructing the pots. Prior to producing the pots for use in the trials (n=100), we will make a small number for testing on a fishing vessel to operationally validate the design (3.5). It is important that the pots land in the orientation intended so we will place underwater cameras in these prototype pots to mitigate the risk of pots landing upside down in the trials.

Deliverables

- WP3-D1 Agreed final pot designs report
- 3.4 Manufacture traps for sea trials (P1M5)
- WP3-D2 Manufacture of 100 bespoke pots.

WP5 - PROGRAMME MANAGEMENT/REPORTING

WP5, Project Management will be continuous throughout the duration of the project. The Project Manager and Project Support roles will maintain a live Risk Register and ensure communication channels between all members of the Project Steering Group are open for the duration of the project and not just the inception and close-out meeting. The staff at Fishtek have worked hard to assemble an experienced and motivated group of experts that are genuinely enthused at the prospects of delivering a feasibility study that could open a new sustainable inshore fishery with subsequent potential to be applied offshore. To this end, all stakeholders to the project are positively engaged and we do not see any risks or issues that cannot be overcome with the team we have assembled.

Deliverables

- WP5-D1: Update Project Steering Committee (PSC) Terms of Reference (ToR)
- WP5-D2: Updates to Project Plan (inc Gantt, Risk Register), Exploitation Plan, Forecasts
