1. Background

This project is being recruited as part of the BEIS Office for Product Safety and Standards Strategic Research Programme (SRP), which was launched in March 2018. This programme provides high quality strategic science-based research to strengthen the evidence base for Safety and Standards policy development, delivery and enforcement, giving business the confidence to innovate and protecting consumers from unsafe products. The wide range of evidence based research supported by the SRP helps to address critical questions relating to current product safety, and/or issues that might arise due to future market developments.

The Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988 (the FFRs) set fire safety requirements for upholstered domestic furniture sold in the UK. This includes fire resistance standards which aim to ensure safety in relation to accidental ignition from a match or cigarette.

The Regulations were introduced in 1988 to help reduce the risks of injury or loss of life through fires in the home spread by upholstered furniture. Between the 1960's and 1980's there was an increase in domestic fire related deaths in the UK. During this time foam fillings had replaced natural, fire-resistant, materials (such as horse hair) making the furniture more affordable. These foams were extremely flammable.

The FFRs aim to ensure safety in relation to accidental ignition from sources such as a match or cigarette. The FFRs do not stipulate how to comply with the fire resistance requirements but most manufacturers use flame retardant chemicals. There are also requirements for labelling and record keeping. The FFRs are enforced by local authority trading standards officers. The OPSS is developing a new approach to the regulations that will maintain and improve fire safety, bring the legislation into line with the approach taken for product safety for other product sectors that follow the new legislative framework (NLF), drive innovation of the ways products meet fire safety requirements to market and facilitate a reduction in the use of chemical flame retardants as the primary means for making furniture fire resistant.

This research will be providing evidence that will inform policy position on the scope of products that will be included in the new approach to the FFRs. It is examining the fire risks of specific upholstered products.

As funding has not yet been approved beyond March 2021 for this project, the project is split into two distinct phases. Phase 1 will cover weeks 1-2 deliverables up to 31 March 2021 for which funding has been approved. Phase 2 will cover deliverables from 1 April 2021 to the conclusion of the contract. Phase 2 can only commence once funding has been approved. This is expected to be known in February/March 2021.

There will be a break clause in the contract on Wednesday 31st March 2021 for BEIS to review whether phase 2 has budgetary approval.

If the break clause is initiated, we would expect the contract to draw to a close by Wednesday 31st March 2021 and if the break clause is not initiated, by Wednesday 30th June 2021.

2. Aims and Objectives of the Project

The project has the following objective:

Research is required to build the evidence base to help inform policy proposals by determining whether certain articles/products represent a significant fire risk based on the product type.

This will be achieved using the following outputs from the research:

1. A systematic review of products identifying holistic hazards and risks associated with fire safety of furniture (risk of catching fire, fuel load and risk of fire spread, chemical exposure from flame retardants, vulnerability of users)
2. An assessment of risk factors and weighting criteria for product types to be considered for inclusion/exclusion in the policy summarising the systematic review of evidence

Expected outcomes from the research:

This research will inform policy proposals on if the products should be excluded from the new approach to furniture fire safety. It is proposed that there is an exclusion list for products who will not fall within the scope and that for manufacturers of these products there they are not required to meet this regulatory burden. Excluded products must comply with the General Product Safety Regulations (GPSR) and will still need to be safe. A balance must be struck between keeping high standards of fire safety and reducing exposure to chemical flame retardants. It is important that products within scope meet and continue to improve on the UK fire safety levels.

1. Strengthen evidence base on furniture fire safety
2. Collate cross-disciplinary evidence on fire safety and chemical exposure in a systematic review
3. Inform options for policy proposal for what products should, or should not, be in scope based on existing evidence
4. Resolve outstanding issues raised in existing research, which focus on the risks of chemical exposure to flame retardants versus the risk of products catching, and spreading, fires
5. If needed suggest areas for further research

In particular, the following questions should be addressed:

There is wealth of existing knowledge and literature available, however this has not yet been brought together systematically, bringing together fire safety risks and chemical exposure risks. We therefore expect the significant first task to be a systematic literature review set against the proposed research questions, which will be built from existing evidence collected and expanded on.

3. Suggested Methodology

A large part of this study is to review and combine findings from the fire safety literature with the chemical exposure literature in a comprehensive and systematic approach. Below is the suggested methodology, however other methodologies that provide the expected outcomes can be proposed and discussed in the kick-off meeting.

A systematic literature review of products identifying holistic hazards and risks associated with fire safety of furniture (risk of catching fire, fuel load and risk of fire spread, chemical exposure from flame retardants, vulnerability of users).

An assessment of risk factors and weighting criteria for product types to be considered for inclusion/exclusion in the policy summarising the systematic review of evidence.

The contractor is expected to undertake the following activities:

Phase 0: Kick-off meeting with the OPSS

- Attend a virtual formal Kick Off meeting. This will include a check that the contractor understands the context and objectives of the work, the project working arrangements, and resolution of any queries regarding the detailed programme of work.
- Write and submit a short inception report to confirm the agreed programme of work and the project timeline.
- Agreement of methodology used in undertaking the research
- An initial task bringing together existing knowledge and identifying gaps will be undertaken at the start of the project. This piece of work will be done upfront to guide the focus of the analysis and work. In addition to this, throughout all the tasks with literature analysis elements, we will ensure that an evidence gap analysis is undertaken.

Phase 1: Undertaking of a desk-based systematic literature review and market analysis

- Market review to identify further products to be included in the scope for investigation
- Literature review of fire statistics to determine whether each product poses a significant fire risk
- Market review of each product to identify size variances, material variances and material compositions
- Literature review and collation of evidence in regard to people's exposure of chemicals flame retardants from each of the products
- Generating a risk matrix based on whether product poses significant fire

PROJ1.1: Approach / Methodology

Our methodology for developing the evidence base for informing policy proposals on whether certain furniture products represent a significant fire risk consists of, in short: (1) a systematic literature review, (2) the development of a risk matrix tool utilizing data from the review, and (3) the preparation of an evidence base for furniture products that may be used to inform exclusions from the new approach to fire safety being developed. Our approach is to combine our team's expertise across systematic review methodologies (Dr Paul Whaley), chemical exposure (Prof Stuart Harrad) and fire science (Prof Richard Hull), furniture product types and constructions (Dr Nia Bell) within a supportive TQM structure. Our research ethos is one of impartiality, robustness, transparency (both during delivery and dissemination of final outputs), and of adding value for the OPSS.

(1) Systematic review for identifying hazards and risks associated with fire safety of furniture.

The first objective of the project is to systematically summarise the wealth of existing knowledge and published scientific literature on fire safety and flame retardant exposure related to the fire safety of furniture.

Step 1.a. Identifying holistic hazards and risks: After identifying obvious risks, we will use established qualitative “thematic analysis”^{i,ii} methods to provide a comprehensive conceptual model of the determinants of hazards and risks associated with furniture fire safety that are described in the scientific literature. This is achieved by taking a sample of high-quality reviews of furniture fire-safety literature and mining them for topics relevant to the immediate review objectives, as defined in the ITQ document, Section 2, Bi-iv. An example showing how a document would be annotated is in Figure 1.

Relationships between the identified concepts will be mapped in a graph (a way of representing knowledge where concepts are nodes and relationships between concepts are represented as labelled arcs or edges). An example of a simple version of how this would look, based on the two example annotated documents, is shown in Figure 2. The relationships in the graph will be analysed for theoretical validity by the topic experts in the team and revised where necessary. Gaps in conceptual coverage of the graph will also be identified and filled via mining of concept-specific literature, selected using snowballing review methods. Figure 2 shows how annotating just one abstract already identifies quite a large topic space. Thus, it is not necessary to mine concepts from all documents, but only a sufficient number of documents in order for conceptual coverage to be achieved. This is an efficient approach to systematically identifying concepts of hazard and risk related to the fire safety of furniture.

Concept modelling will be conducted using Atlas.ti qualitative analysis software. Atlas.ti is an industry benchmark tool facilitating fully transparent, reproducible concept discovery and qualitative analysis methods, showing how the concept model is developed by the review team, and directly relating concepts in the model to their occurrence in the scientific literature from which the model is derived.

SUMMARY

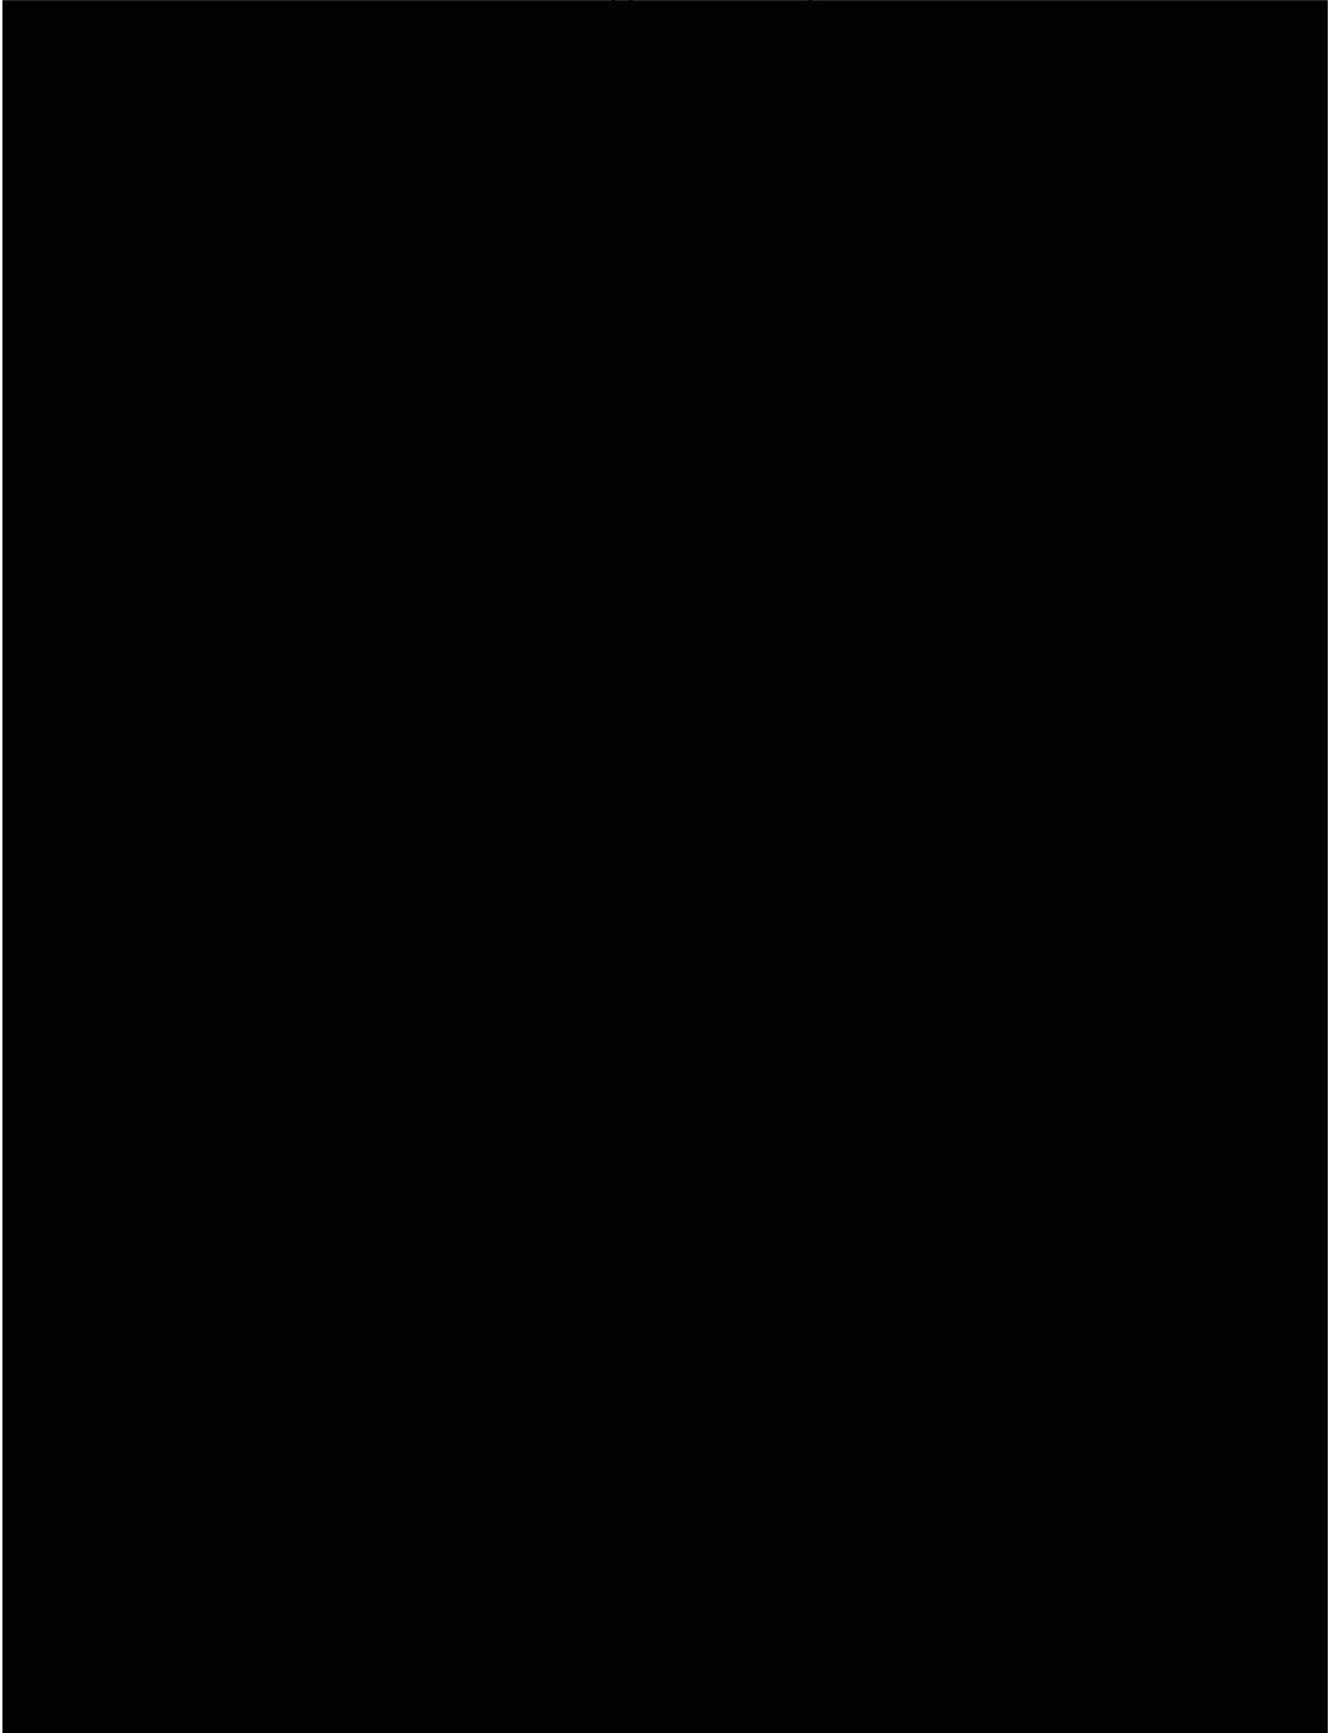

Upholstered furniture remains a consumer fire hazard. Flame retardant technologies are necessary but may present a health risk from chemical exposure. This study developed methodologies for measuring exposure to flame retardants and flammability performance, comparing the effectiveness of differing flammability reduction strategies on upholstered chairs with and without added flame retardants and the use of a barrier material. The chemical analysis focused on volatile organic compounds (VOCs) and flame retardants. Open flame tests were conducted on chair assemblies, and smoke resistance tests were conducted on chair materials. Results showed that VOC inhalation exposure during consumer use was low for all chair types. However, VOCs were significantly elevated during the chair burns. The barrier upholstered flame retardant used in this study was found to be settled dust and debris transfer samples. The chairs with a barrier material demonstrated significantly lower flammability hazards when compared to the other chair types. All assembled chairs did not meet the criteria for ignitable testing, suggesting a lack of correlation with flammability performance. This study demonstrated that combined human health and flammability advantages may be achieved for upholstered chairs constructed with an effective fire barrier material without any added flame retardants.
